New York Republicans Are Sick of Their Boss, He Says.

Lamont Will Decline to Be a National Committeeman.

Col. Daniel S. Lamont is on his way to the ine woods with ex-Secretary of the Navy Whitney and other gentlemen who are inter ested with him in a suiphite fibre plant which they are about inspecting.

would dereat Osborne for Senator.

Many politicians think they see in the uttarances of ex-Senator Warner Miller in Chicago, as telegraphed from that city, sure signs of a renewal of the war between the factions of the Republican party in this State, headed respectively by Mr. Miller and Thomas C. Platt.

"The Republican ticket (in New York) was defeated," said Mr. Miller, "by the farmers in the interior of the State staying at home Election Day. They had no interest in "ammany on anti-Tammany, and so did not take the trouble to go to the polls."

many or anti-Tammany, and so did not take the trouble to go to the polis."

While this criticism of the issue upon which the Republicans managers elected to make their campaign is significant, the next words of the mac outside the breatworks are full of meaning, and construed as a literal digging up of the factional hatchet. Mr. Miller was asked who was the choice of New York Republicans as a Presidential candidate.

"No one can tell that," said he, "till the delegates are elected. I am not the boss,' and do not pretend to speak for the New York Republicans. One thing I think certain, and that is that the poople will have something to say about it. "Bosses' will find that they cannot control the party as they have done. The people have had about all they want of boss,' dictation. It has not proved profit—able."

The report of the Sanitary Inspector in neither case seems to go to the root of the trouble, which the residents of Monroe and Cherry streets say is due to the careless manner of rendering or boiling out the rancid fats and greases which enter into the composition of Mr. Fay's soap.

One of these complaints was investigated early in July last by Sanitary Inspector George E. Shrady, jr. This official visited the factory and described the big fat-rendering vats in both the Monroe street and Cherry street sections of the building.

The fats and greases are transferred from one vat to another by means of pipes, and are treated successively with caustic sods, rosin and other agents. The inspector does not say anything about the smells arising from the decomposed ingredients, but says that he pair and leaking, and that the drippings from these caused foul stenches.

He also tound that under the steps leading from the front to the rear building there was a repository for the refuse from the vats, and that a large mass of filth had accumulated there which emitted bad odors. The stable-yard, too, was found to be in a metal breathing-tube had been inserted in her windpipe to prevent death by strangulation. When the swelling in the child's throat subsided the metal tube slipped down into her largnx. The hospital surgeon could not reach it, and heroic measures had to be resported to to prevent the tube liself from doing what the croup had threatened to do—choke her to death.

That is why Mary's throat was cut. The exact location of the tube was determined by electricity, and then Dr. J. Mount Bleyer made an incision in the windpipe and took out the tube.

This operation is called trachectomy, and is rarely resorted to in the cases of young children as it very often proves tatal.

There was no help for it in Mary's case, however, and owing to her great vigor and vitality she will most likely survive the operation. She was resting easily at the hospitality and with the survive the desired in the case of the cas metal breathing-tube had been inserted in neighbors, some of whom then remembered
